EMILY TEEL NAMED EDITOR-IN-CHIEF OF SPOONFUL MAGAZINE

Philadelphia, PA – January 19, 2017 – Emily Teel has been named Editor-in-Chief of Spoonful Magazine, a seasonal magazine and high-quality cookbook that's at the forefront of the bookazine movement.

“Emily has been essential to the editorial success of Spoonful Magazine as we approach our first birthday this spring and celebrate being named one of the 30 Hottest Magazine Launches in 2016,” says Kristina Erfe Pines, founder and publisher of Spoonful Magazine, which is based outside Philadelphia in Wynnewood, PA. “She has led our efforts to bring the art of home cooking and gathering back into the modern home, at a time when a sense of connectedness and community is more important than ever.”

Emily began her career at Spoonful as food editor with the launch of the publication's first issue in Spring 2016. Since then, she has migrated into the role of editor-in-chief as the founder, Kristina Erfe Pines, has taken on the increasing demands of business operations, distribution and public appearances fueled by Spoonful's growth.

Emily is already well known as a freelance food writer, recipe editor, tester and developer. A regular contributor to Eater Philly, Uwishunu, Grid Magazine, Edible Philly, and Foobooz, her writing has also appeared in Serious Eats, Civil Eats, USA Today, the Huffington Post and The Kitchn.

A graduate of Bryn Mawr College and a Legacy Award Winner with the women's culinary organization Les Dames d'Escoffier International, Emily is passionate about food and committed to the idea that everyone deserves access to meals that are both nourishing and satisfying. She completed a Master of Arts in Food Culture and Communications at the University of Gastronomic Sciences in 2011 as well as a residency teaching food writing at the LongHouse Food Scholars Program. Emily began her career as a Senior Manager of Food Donations at the non-profit food bank Philabundance.
